what you think." "He looks well enough," answers the other, laboring usually under some little emotion. "Well, Jean, reveal your secret to this gentleman." Whereupon Jean introduces a knitting needle under his eyelids. removes his eye, places under his cyclids, removes his eye, places it in the hand of the astonished spectator it in the hand of the astonished spectator as unconcernedly as though it were a shirt stud. How is it possible to resist such a demonstration? These gentlemen charge from forty to fitty francs for an eye. The manufacturer of the Rue du Temple has an entirely different way of doing business. He is generally a man pretty well informed; simple, polite, a little of an artist, a little of awarkman and a little of a tradesman. of a workman and a little of a tradeaman. He scarcely employs either apprentice or assistant, except when he receives a good order from some naturalist for animals' eyes for his collection. All day long, seated at a table at one end of his work room, he works by the light of a spirit lamp. Before him are arranged, in either cakes or sticks, the materials used by him in his profession. He takes little enamel, melts it, and by the aid of a blow-pipe, blows it until it becomes a small ball at the end of the instrument. This ball is destined to représent the white of the eye. Henext takes some more enamel, which of a workman and a little of a tradesman Gently heating it at the flame, it spreads out into a red spot, and eventually becomes flat, and resembles the iris. A darker drop of enamel placed in the same manner in the centre of the iris limitates the pupil. The ball is now detached from the blow-pipe, cut to an oval shape, and smoothed at the edges, so that on introducing it beneath the eyelid it may not wound any of the smaller nerves. These eyes cost no more than from twenty to twenty-five francs, which one can quite comprehend, as there is neither heavy rent to pay, nor the wages of a livried cyclops.

The manulacture of artificial eyes is both difficult and tedious. It suits alike both men and women, and many of the latter succeed well in it; it is, moreover, one of the best remunerated of art industries. Most of the work-people are paid by plece-work—that is, so much an eye, varying from ten to fitteen france, and a clever workman will turn out his eye

HAVANA, November 1.—Haytlen ad-vices to the 13th of October have been reclever workman will turn out his eye per diem. Others receive from the large manufacturers a share of the proceeds arising from the sales of eyes manufactured by them, and have to take back any eyes not approved of by the customers. These they put on one side, to serve for their stock in trade when they commence business on their own account.

One of those collections form a somewhat curious sight. Reposing upon wadding at the bottom of a drawn are say.

ding at the bottom of a drawer are several eyes, ranged side by side, and exhibiting a singularity of expression. Some are small, others large, some black, others blue, hazel brown, bluish and greenish grey, nearly all brilliant; all have a fixed start-all are in fort looking your grey, nearly all brilliant; all have a fixed stare—all are, in fact, looking you through. On one side are laughing childrens' eyes, next to them the liquid-looking eyes of young girls, the languid eyes of middle-aged women, eyes with an amiable or sinister expression, severe official eyes; then came the old men's eyes, slightly filmy; and in a corner are the worn-out eyes—eyes that have been already used, and have been returned by the customers as models to make other eyes by. The camel's eye, after being exposed to the action of the atmosphere for posed to the action of the atmosphere some months, loses alike its color and its some months, loses alike its color and its luster, and becomes opaque looking; a thick, dingy coating of solidified humors spreads over its polished surface, and it has a glassy look like the eye of a dead person. "Touch them, you will do no narm," says the oculist to visitors, just as though it was a collection of coins or minerals they were inspecting.
